

BLACK-EYED SUSAN

Rudbeckia hirta

Habitat

They are a common wildflower in grasslands and around the banks of rivers, ponds, and streams.

Food

Sun, soil, freshwater

Predators

Important food for chickadees, sparrows, and the larvae of butterflies and moths

Reproduction

These flowers are cross-pollinated when their pollen is carried by the wind and by bees.

Where are they today?

They are common in gardens and parks around the city.